THE NIGHT OF REJOICING

Republicans, After Hard Work, Gather In Large Crowds to Hear Good News.

Scenes on the Streets and About the Journal and Other Buildings as the Returns Were Shown to the Chattering Multitudes.

The Democratic Leaders Prepare Their Party to Expect a Crushing Defeat.

Marion County Comes to the Assistance of the Republican Candidates with Gains, Indicating a Decisive Success All Along the Line.

The excitement naturally arising from the heated campaign Indiana has lately passed through began to grow more intense throughout the city last night, as soon as the polls were closed. Despite the Democratic bulldozing schemes of Hawkins's deputies, citizens generally conceded that they had secured more votes for the Republican party than had been anticipated. As early as 7 o'clock the streets of the business portion of the city were crowded, especially in such localities as the New Denison Hotel and Journal office, where the returns were thrown out by a stereoscopic. The corridors of the hotel were packed to their utmost. In the New Denison building had not a popular following, as was evidenced by the large number of backers of Harrison who made standing offers without takers. On New York and Indiana offer after offer was made, but never accepted. In a few instances, where the ridicule of the crowd was feared, small wagers were made, but they bore the savor of policy rather than discretion. North Pennsylvania street was one continued jam of men of both parties, there being but few women in the crowd. There was no enthusiastic cheering on either side, as all recognized the fact that the time had come when cheers would amount to nothing. It was only a few hours of suspense and then the great campaign of 1888 would be over.

Chairman Huston with some of the State committee members were early in the evening resting easily in the Republican headquarters and from their countenances one would draw the inference that everything from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico was in their hands. They would concede nothing. Their only advice was to wait the returns, when, as they said, everything would prove the efficient work done by the Republicans over the country. A true conception of the enthusiastic crowds that collected around the bulletin board could only be had by being a spectator. An hour before any reports whatever were posted the shouts themselves hoarse as pictures of General Harrison were thrown upon the screens. Cheers after cheer arose and was carried on down the street by those who were not permitted to get within reading distance. The first returns published, unimportant as they were, were sufficient to raise the enthusiasm to its highest pitch, which seemed to increase as it was possible, as the reports grew more favorable. The security of Democratic gains, so far as shown by the earlier received dispatches, caused as much uneasiness as did the rejection of reports of Republican gains over the election of 1884. The fact was generally recognized, however, that early returns would serve further than to show the general drift of the tide.

An incident of the evening occurred when some one thought of the great Harrison from Indiana, who had been here from Md., and in a few minutes five hundred men were pulling it through the streets. The crowd seemed liable to do most anything before daylight if good news kept coming.

The enthusiasm among the crowds collected around the bulletin boards remained at a high pitch all night, the numbers of curious watchers not decreasing until the first dawn of the morning was dimmed by the breaking of day. The telegram announcing that the New York Sun had received the returns from the majority of the 10,000 for Harrison came only as a starter to increase the cheers. Gradually the bulletins at places other than the Journal office were closed. About 10 o'clock a telegram came from Market street, blocking it from Pennsylvania street to the Circle, for here the State and county central committees were at work on the returns. The wires were cut, and as they were received over the wires were shown. As soon as the Republican victory in New York State was an established fact, all after call went up for "How's Indiana?" and as precincts were reported showing Republican gains the loyalty of the Harrison was brought to a crucial test. General Harrison, Levi P. Morton, General Grant and other statesmen brought forth round after round of applause. As the morning drew nearer, the wild crowd, growing hilarious with excitement, would receive a return of the next moment follow it up by a refrain of "Bye, Grover, bye; O, good-bye, old Grover, good-bye." Another refrain, "The matter with Harrison! He's all right." Some one started the cry, "What's the matter with Grover?" The reply came quickly enough, "He's striped."

As the returns began to arrive more slowly, the artist at the lantern conceived the idea of amusing the crowd, who were willing to take up and roundly cheer any picture, motto or cartoon that savored of Republican partiality. Cleveland was duly represented in his famous fishing excursion, in his friendly attitude toward England and in every conceivable shade of dead and dispirited rooster. By 3 o'clock nothing but Republican returns could be read anywhere in the city. The Senatorial office, which had promised such hopeful returns to its misguided readers, shut up shop at 1 o'clock, casting upon its screen, as a "good-night" scene, the picture of Grover Cleveland, with a wet blanket, eliciting no cheers. The people at that office had long since been compelled to concede New York and Connecticut. Republican everywhere were shouting for Harrison, simple line, such as "Whoop'er up boys, we're all right," being sufficient to start deafening rounds of enthusiastic applause.

At Democratic Headquarters.

Everything was quiet at the Bates House last night, all the interest of that neighborhood being concentrated at Dalton's, where the returns were being received. A large crowd had assembled at that point, and frequent cheers went up as the news came in. At the Democratic State headquarters there was not very much enthusiasm at any time. A great many telegrams were received by parties on the inside room, where none but a few were admitted. Every minute the white head of Judge Jordan would appear at the door, and he would read an encouraging bit of news and the crowd would cheer. News was given out pretty frequently in the evening, but soon began to be suspiciously scarce, while the stream of telegraph boys continued to go into the inner office. At 10 o'clock a telegram came from the New York Sun claiming that State for Cleveland had 16,280, and the cheering was loud and continuous. Five minutes afterward a telegram from Chairman Brice claimed New York by 10,000, and the cheering was not so long or so loud. It was more than fifteen minutes before any more news was given out, but the streams of private telegrams continued to go into the inside office. "There is too much news going in and not enough coming out to suit me," said Dr. Harrison, the president of the benevolent boards, sadly, "and I don't like it; it looks suspicious." The faces of all but the most sanguine grew very long.

"We've still got New York haven't we Judge?" some one inquired.

"We think so, and hope so," he answered, "and there was not very much encouragement in his voice, and his assertion did not bring forth any cheering."

"We must have Indiana," he answered, "and we have not yet heard anything from this State."

"Judge," some one in the back part of the room exclaimed, in a tone of agony, "go back in your office and carry Indiana, for God's sake. Go quick." Drops of perspiration stood upon every forehead in the room.

Jim Dowling slipped into the inner room and was unceremoniously fired out, and he raised a row that diverted attention from the main issue for a few minutes, but at 11 o'clock a sadder and more solemn-looking crowd than Mr. Jewett and his attaches and crowd were never seen at a funeral.

From 11 o'clock until 12 matters became more and more discouraging. At the latter hour, Chairman Jewett, and Judge Jordan, and several others from the inner sanctuaries, slipped out to get a lunch and they did not return, and some of the crowd assembled were not disposed to look upon this action of the chairman as very favorable omen. In one or two instances there were mutterings against Jewett, and Sherin, and Brice, and all connected with the Democratic management. "The trouble with our side," said one, "is that we have had too many wooden-headed running things. The idea of putting up that man Brice to buck against a man like Quay. Why, Quay can give him a good thrashing and he will not return, and the crowd assembled were not disposed to be talkative and many of them were asleep. At intervals the door to the inner room would open and a weak-kneed young man would read a telegram, and those that gave a ray of Democratic light would partially galvanize the crowd into life, but it would sink back into its former state of sullen melancholy. Luther Reason went home at 1 o'clock, requesting that if things should change for the better that they would send him word. A few minutes later Judge Fritz came out of the inner room and made a straight shoot for the front door. He was not quick enough, however, for an anxious crowd had gathered at the door, and a drowning man grabbing at a straw. Now look here, Judge," said he, "tell us just how it is. You fellows in the room have not been doing the square thing by us in the way of news, and we want to know the straight of it, right now."

"Well, boys," replied the Judge, "things don't look in the least better, and I'm a bad, bad, and that's the fact. Of course we don't give up anything, but its my private opinion that we are gone, hide, horns and everything. I want to leave here and go home."

At 1:30 it was announced that no more bulletins would be received, and the little band of the faithful who had remained for the night, for their homes sadder if not wiser men. Five minutes later the Democratic headquarters of 1888 were dark and deserted.

At General Harrison's Home.

General Harrison received the returns at his residence, where a private wire, bringing the bulletins, ran into the library, and it was in this room that the General, with a few friends and neighbors passed nearly the entire night. The long, oval writing-table had been cleared, and around it sat the little party. At the center of the table on one side sat General Harrison, while at the end was his son Russell, and at the other sat his law partner John B. Elam. The other gentlemen present were W. H. H. Miller, another law partner, the secretary to the General, a Governor Porter, Judge Geo. Scott of this city, brother of Mrs. Harrison, Captain Horace McKay, a near neighbor, Col. Millard, and Benj. Walcott, of Utica, N. Y. As the bulletins from New York and other States were received they would be read by the General, frequently by Mr. Elam or some of the other gentlemen. Mr. Russell Harrison occupied himself in assorting the bulletins by States.

General Harrison received a large number of private telegrams from the national committee from friends in Washington, Cincinnati and many other points. Of course but few, if any, of these telegrams contained any positive information as to results, but all were of a cheering character, and not a few were congratulatory in their expressions. The scene in the General's library, while a memorable occasion to those present, was that of a quiet gathering of a few neighbors, the General was cool and self-possessed. During the brief intervals between bulletins the conversation was general; prognostications and calculations were freely considered and predicted in by the General, who discussed the returns and the outlook with a freedom devoid of personal interests. In the parlors with Mr. Harrison and her daughter, Mrs. McKee, were Mrs. Russell Harrison, Mrs. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McKee, Mrs. Millard, Miss Steele, and Mrs. R. M. Brown, the daughter of ex-Senator Davis of West Virginia, who is the guest of Mrs. Harrison. At midnight the little party separated, and about 1 o'clock General Harrison retired for the night, leaving the library in the possession of his son and Mr. McKee and a few friends who remained through the night, receiving the early morning bulletins.

Returns from the County.

The length of the ticket and the scratching delayed the work of the election boards so that it was not until 11 o'clock that the first returns from Marion county were received. After that they came in slowly, showing the following:
